Object: Seeking a non-monopolistic Software and OS market.

As we can see clearly with shipment of XP, Microsoft has not changed and will not change unless you do something about this. In XP, they are currently seeking the death of MP3. Given that they can't provide a better technology, they use there monopolistic market to leverage their own technology. It is exactly that kind of behavior that makes our technological lives totally miserable. Once a smaller company produces a winning product or solution, they create something hardly comparable and blocks the original solution from their OS. This is unacceptable. Bullying shouldn't be rewarded.

I strongly hope that you will pursue the avenue of breaking up Microsoft in 2 distinct and separated companies. This is the only solution that doesn't rely on having them understanding their wrong-doing.

Good luck and, should you succeed, we will be forever be grateful about your contribution to a successful technological non-monopolistic society.
